If the debtor purchased the goods of complainant with the fraudulent design of subjecting them to the executions of his near relations and other friends having claims against him however just, it affords a clear case for equitable relief: Id.

A purchaser gains no title, and acquires no right of retaining goods, if he obtain possession by gross fraud under color of purchase, whether on credit or otherwise: Id.

When goods are sold for cash on delivery, if the purchaser, on delivery of the goods and demand of payment, refuses to pay the purchase-money, it is competent for the vendor at once to reclaim the goods, and seek the protection of a court of equity against judgment-creditors of the vendee: Id.

In such a case no title passes. The condition of the sale is violated. If an insolvent purchaser, concealing his insolvency from the vendor, procures goods without intending to pay for them, the property in the goods will not be changed: Id.

When, however, the vendor does not disaffirm the contract, and reclaim the goods as his own, but, on the failure and absconding of the vendee, issues an attachment against him for the debt, and afterwards obtains judgment by confession against him, and seeks to enforce the judgment by claiming an equitable lien on the goods sold, that is an affirmance of the contract; and there is no principle on which the complainant is entitled to that relief against prior judgment-creditors of the vendee when executions have been levied on the goods: Id.
